Biographical resources

What are biographical resources?

Biographical resources provide written historical information about a person's life and family. For family historians these resources may range from birth, death and marriage indexes and obituaries or funeral notices in newspapers to published works such as pioneer indexes, local histories and biographical dictionaries.

How will these resources help me in my family history research?

Birth, death and marriage indexes

- Depending on the state, you can find basic information such as parents' names, dates and places of birth, death or marriage.
- Certificates will provide basic information as mentioned above as well as possible information on how long they lived in Australia and/or the state they died in. They may also mention what ship they came out on if they immigrated to Australia.

Obituaries, funeral and death notices

- Can provide you with other relatives' names, places where a person lived and/or died, a history of the person's life and even what they died of.

Electoral rolls

- Can provide you with a place of living, other members of the household and occupations.

Pioneer Indexes

- Often compiled by local family history groups, these indexes provide details about people who settled the area.
- Can contain information such as birth/marriage/death dates, number of children, and brief life history (how and when arrived, job/s done etc.).

Biographical collections

- Biographical registers for members of parliament: Commonwealth and State.
- Biographical registers that relate specifically to our original pioneers (e.g. families from the First Fleet)
- Biographical registers relating to specific subjects such as occupations (e.g. clergy) or sport.
- Encyclopedias and local histories of regions.

For more information on birth, death and marriage indexes; as well as obituaries, funeral and death notices please consult Research guides: Birth, deaths and marriages: Australia, New Zealand, England and Wales; and Newspapers and family history.
