Naturalisation records

Why did migrants apply to be naturalised?

The call for migrants to the Australian colonies saw an influx of people from several European and Asian countries. However, non-British migrants did not have the same rights and privileges as British settlers.

Before 1849, aliens could only be naturalised by a special Act of Parliament. However, granting of letters of denization occurred between 1834 and 1848 allowing aliens to enjoy some of the rights of a natural born British. The issuing of letters of denization stopped after 1848. Legislation in 1849 formalised the process of naturalisation. Naturalisation gave settlers most of the rights their fellow British colonists enjoyed, including the right to own land.

Prior to 1904 the States were responsible for naturalisation applications. Records for Queensland, New South Wales, Tasmania, and Western Australia up to this date are held in the relevant State Archives. National Archives of Australia holds the naturalisation records for Victoria and South Australia.

How can I access naturalisation records?

From 1904 naturalisation became a federal government responsibility. Naturalisation records from this date are in the National Archives of Australia (NAA). Name references to early 20th century naturalisation records may be found in the NAA's online database RecordSearch [Name Search tab > Immigration & Naturalisations] <https://www.naa.gov.au/explore-collection>

State Library of Queensland holds:

- Index to Commonwealth naturalization certificates 1904-1917 / compiled by Australian Genealogical Education Centre (AGEC) volunteers. [microfiche] (MFC 929.394 1996)
- Certificates of naturalisation : Commonwealth 1904-1937 Commonwealth 1904-1937 [microfilm] (MFL 929.394)
