

Family History

Orphanages, institutions and child migrants

Orphanage and home records

Access to most records relating to orphanages and children's homes is restricted. Records are generally held by the government or by the organization which ran the institution. Early records of government run institutions may be found in the relevant State archival repository. State Library of Queensland holds a number of published resources that can assist family historians to locate the appropriate records and there are a number of websites that are also helpful.

Australia

Find and Connect <http://www.findandconnect.gov.au> is a first port of call. It provides up-to-date lists of support groups and services available to Forgotten Australians and former Child Migrants. There is an email enquiry form as well as practical help and advice about accessing records. This is an Australia-wide site, but records are organised on a state basis.

Queensland

Missing Pieces: information to assist former residents of children's institutions to access records. Available at the level 3 desk. It lists locations of records for government and non-government Queensland institutions. It provides brief details of the establishment and operation of each institution, the types and date ranges of records available, and contact details for access to the records.

Find and Connect is more up-to-date.

Child migrants

From 1900-1960 state governments and charitable institutions operated various schemes to bring child migrants to Australia. Many children were orphans but large numbers were illegitimate and had at least one parent living. The Federal Government supported these schemes but most records that name individual migrants are located in State government archives or in the archives of the relevant charitable institutions.
